

In 2023, 84% of the Norwegian respondents read a book and 70% bought one. As in most countries, paper books dominate the Norwegian market. However, what is noteworthy when compared to respondents in the other surveyed countries, Norwegians tend to buy more audiobooks (27% compared to the 16% average) and less e-books (19% compared to the 28% average). This interest in audiobooks can be linked to Norwegians' preference to subscribe to audiobook services, a prevalent trend in all Nordic countries. Moreover, Norwegian respondents prefer to buy new books (95%) and tend to buy second-hand books less than the average of the study respondents (28% compared to 35%). In terms of genres, fiction is the most purchased followed by overall non-fiction, biographies and memoirs. As in all the other countries, most respondents buy both online and in physical shops, with the main motivations to buy in independent physical bookshops being the convenience of a physical space.

Introduction

In order to stay resilient, keep a relevant offer of books and a viable business in a fast-paced world, retailers such as booksellers need a solid understanding and knowledge of current trends and consumers' shopping priorities. To a certain degree, such knowledge can be gained from engaging with the regular customers and the local community, but real foresight can only be achieved through research into customers' priorities and behaviours, through data collection and analysis. To meet this need and sector priority, EIBF commissioned a study through its RISE Bookselling project titled RISE study on Consumer Behaviour-Book-Buying Trends, Reading Habits & Customer Needs in December 2023.

Out of several candidates, Listen, a Belgian-based consultancy with pre-existing contacts and experience in multi-country surveys was deemed the most fitting and was contracted in late 2023 to carry out the study. Throughout spring 2024, Listen conducted an online quantitative survey in 19 countries across the globe, where EIBF's members are based. A representative sample of 500 respondents was collected per country, and 9500 people were surveyed in total, giving us unique insights and the possibility to compare current trends and consumers' attitudes to book-buying in the 19 countries surveyed.

The study takes into consideration that globalisation and the digital revolution have undoubtedly changed the way people purchase and consume goods, including books, thus transforming today's retail environment and customers' buying habits. Research like this is therefore invaluable as it can provide booksellers with tools and precious information to help anticipate what their customers look for and might expect from them, not only today, but also tomorrow. Most importantly, it can help them remain competitive and resilient.
